Consider This.

"Let the country editors and the country store keepers remember what experience in this country proves already—that work on a very great scale cannot be done as efficiently as on a smaller one with closer INDIVIDUAL ATTENTION."

"The storekeeper who attends to his customer, who adjusts complaints and makes things right, who can give advice, and who, with the PARCELS POST, will be able to deliver immediately anything that is ordered—in less than one-quarter of the time that the mail order houses have been delivering—that storekeeper, backed up by the country editor, will know a prosperity that he has never known." —N. Y. Journal, Dec. 27

Henry Warner and wife arrived here recently and will spend this year on the Morjon James place. The young couple were married in Beloit, Wisconsin and made this point on their wedding tour, and liked North Dakota so well that they determined to cast their lot with the people of this state. Mr. Warner is a brother of Mrs. James.

Joe Pederson, one of Almont's up-to-date and progressive farmers, who believes in diversified farming brought to town three hogs the first of the week, and sold them for $73.64. Those hogs represent the by-products of farming, and the student farmer is developing these side lines to their fullest extent. Almont needs a few more Joe Ped-ersons and the best move the business men of Almont can make is to encourage greater economy on the farm and that would mean a greater development of the side lines or in other words, diversified farming.

The STOLEN SINGER

by MARTINA DELLINGER

SYNOPSIS.

Anita Redmond, opera singer, starting for an auto drive in New York. She is stopped by a man, who she recognizes as an old friend of her mother, who has left her property. There she is recaptured by a stranger, who follows her to the auto, where she is held. Her mother, Miss Hamilton of Long Island, decides to go on a holiday. She goes to New York and her wife, Mrs. Hamilton, decides to accompany her. Hamilton sees Anita for the first time in the city. She is very much in love.

CHAPTER IV.—Continued.

"I think my preparation a prior one," he remarked with dogged precision: "but, of course, Miss Reynier must decide." He recovered his temper enough to add, quite pleasantly, considering the circumstances, "I think Madame Reynier will thank my part" turning to the woman.

"Oh, no not fair," objected Jones. "Madame Reynier's always on my side. Aren't you, Madame?" Madame Reynier smiled virtuously. "My always on the side of virtue in distress," she said.

"That's me then, isn't it? The way you're abusing me, Madam, isn't it? You're here to Van Camp all the evening!"

"Van Camp said good-night in Jones at the corner, after they had walked together in silence for half a block. "Good-night, Van Camp," said Jones; then he added, "By the way, I'm going back next week in my private car to watch the opening of the Lice gala, and it might be glad if you would go with me." "Thank—thank you," she said, "I will see you soon," she said quietly.

about old face. "I'll think it all over, Auntie dear."

"Not a bad achievement," said Melanie. "There was an interval of silence, while the young woman stood looking out of the window. Madame Reynier cut the leaves of a French journal. She did not read, however, and presently she broke the silence. "I don't remember that Mr. Van Camp ever said anything to me about flowers. He thinks flowers are the most intimate of all gifts, and should only be exchanged between sweethearts. At least, I heard him say so."

"I love you to go home, Auntie, or is it that you think I ought to go?"

"I don't want to go without you, child, you know that; and I am very anxious to see you."

"You've already answered a note from Mr. Van Camp this morning, Auntie. No, don't worry; she polished up a sudden anxious look that came upon her aunt's countenance. "He's not said you to him. But he's coming to see me at twelve. If I don't give him a chance to say what he has to say, he'll take one anywhere. I'll be waiting for you."

"I'm supposed to be starting on a cruise," he told Melanie. "But luck is with me. My cousin hasn't turned up—or rather he turned up only to disappear instantly. Therefore I can't have dragged me off to catch the first ship with me hanging back like an anchor-chain."

"No, not a word more than that, why? You know of a boat named the Jeanne D'Arc?"

"You've very well; but it can't matter. It must be another vessel, surely. Meanwhile, that are you going to do without your companion?"

"I can't talk to you towering over me like that, she said at last, looking up at her. "I don't want you to talk to me about it. All I want is for you to say yes."

"Alec started straight for the gilt chair. "Oh, no; not that! You are four times too big for that chair. Besides, it's quite valuable; it's a Louis Quinze."

"Melanie's mood of softness had not left her; but sitting there, face to face with this man, face to face with his seriousness, his masculine will and strength, she felt that she had something to struggle for, some deep personal right to be acknowledged. It was with a dignity, an self-respect that was quite real, yet very sweet, that she met this American lover. He had her hand in his firm grasp, but he was waiting for her to speak. He was giving her the hearing that was, in his opinion, her right."

"I know you wish to tell me all these things, Melanie, but I do not want you to recall painful matters of the past now," said Alec gently. "You shall tell me of them at another time."

"The color brightened in Melanie's face, her eyes glowed. "No, not another time; you must understand me now, especially because all this sorrow leads me to what I really want to say to you. It is this: I do not now care for the man I loved at nineteen, nor for any of the other men of my country who have been pleased to honor me with their regard. But ever since those early days I have had a dream of a home—a place different from Duke Stephen's home, different from the homes of many people of my rank. My dream has a husband in it who is a companion, a friend, my equal in love, my superior in strength. Melanie's eyes lifted to meet Alec's, and they were full of an almost tragic passion; but it was a passion for comprehension and love, not primarily for the man himself, for she was a dreamer. "And for my dream I'd give all the wealth, all the love, I have."

"The room was very still. Alec Van Camp sat quiet and grave, his forehead resting on his hand. He had finally, Melanie thought, won his side, pale and quite worn. "I don't think I should consult my cousin."

"I know you were tilted and important, Melanie, and, at first I thought that sealed my case entirely. But you seemed to forget your state, seemed not to care so very much about it, and perhaps that was because I think it was possible for us both to forget it, or at least to ignore it. I haven't a gold throne to give you; but you're the only woman I've ever wanted to marry."

"Do you know also that if I marry out of my rank and without the consent of Duke Stephen, I shall forfeit all my fortune?"

"I don't think it should matter. I'm not a fortune-hunter, and I don't think I should care for a fortune. I'm not a fortune-hunter, and I don't think I should care for a fortune. I'm not a fortune-hunter, and I don't think I should care for a fortune."
